Dr. Heyrman's talk explores the mounting concern among White Protestants in the antebellum North that slaveholders were corrupting their shared faith by encouraging a mixture of Christianity and West African spiritualities to incubate in the slave quarters. It figures as one chapter in Dr. Heyrman's investigation of the ways in which the growth of religious diversity deepened the sectional alienation in the three decades that proceeded the Civil War.