Approximately half of all history PhDs end up in tenured or tenure-track positions in colleges and universities. Only one-third of those are in research universities. Are our PhD programs preparing students for the careers they are likely to have, whether as faculty in the broad context of higher education or beyond the professoriate? Jim Grossman, executive director of the American Historical Association, will discuss the AHA’s inquiries into whether and how graduate preparation in history might adapt to this changing landscape.
